FORGETFULNESS AND AGING

Forgetfulness is often a normal part of aging. Misplacing reading glasses, forgetting names or having a lot of “senior moments” is nothing more than an annoyance for many aging adults.

However, this is not the case with everyone. If your loved one’s forgetfulness is compounded by such things as complications completing mundane tasks, problem solving, understanding spatial relationships or change of mood and behavior, then it may be a more serious form of memory impairment.

If you suspect that someone you love is suffering from a form of dementia, contact your primary care physician for a screening. Medication is available to help with the symptoms and may slow the progression of the disease.

With the disease becoming more prevalent, many senior living settings are dedicating resources to caring for individuals with poor cognition. From Assisted Living Communities to Adult Day Programs, there are several options to provide safe, secure and nurturing environments for adults with memory impairments.

If you are caring for someone with memory deficits, a CarePatrol Senior Advisor is available FREE of charge to help inform you of the continuing care options that may be available in your area. Contact your local CarePatrol Senior Advisor below.
